

Another type of student is unmotivated one, who is not at all interested in school. This type of student is usually in school only because of his parents. That is, only because it is very important to his parents that he "get an education". To them, getting an education means "getting ahead" or gaining social status; therefore, they urge him to stay in school when he would rather be working. Understandably, he does not do very well in school because he has no interest in the courses he must take- that is, no interest either in the subject itself or in the learning process in general. Obviously, such a student can give very little from being in school.
